Excerpt from Indian Wars of New England, Vol. 2

For the poet and romanticist the Abenake country has been a prolific inspiration. It is the ancient Norumbega. The word itself is picturesquely suggestive of the marvelous tales of Ingram, whose visions of its golden towers rivaled the glow of the sunset's fires, and whose plethora of treasures surpassed those of the Incas. No wonder it became for a century the El Dorado, the Mecca, of the English and French adventurers along the northeast coast of Maine, whose traditions were finally to be dissolved into the thin air of unreality by Samuel de Champlain, in 1604.

Cartier was at Hochelaga on the St. Lawrence in 1534, but the results of this voyage were of indifferent importance. His voyage of the following year was of larger meaning, to be referred to later.
