Not illustrated. 1836 Excerpt: ...must feel; but she did not shrink from the approaching peril. She was one who would act as long as action could avail; and if misfortune came, would bear it with resignation. There was something almost awful to the timid Walton in the resolution of one so young and lovely. He had known, had loved her from a child; but his regard, always mingled with respect, was now little short of veneration. "Since our only chance of avoiding the danger rests in immediately checking Mr. Sawyer in his schemes, our first act must be to decide on a fitting person for the task. You are acquainted with all the circumstances--are known to enjoy my father's confidence, and can thus best baffle the wily speculator. Could you--would you, by undertaking this unpleasant duty, double our debt of gratitude?" Florence had hesitated before she spoke, and her appeal was made in doubt; for she felt that Mr. Walton's habitual caution and timidity might disincline him to the office, and would certainly lessen his efficiency in it should he undertake it. The appeal was answered with a deprecating VOL. II. I in a hurry that proved the correctness of her judgment. "Me, Miss Lyle! how could you think of such a thing? I am highly honoured by your good opinion; but what could I do against Mr. Sawyer? He would heed me as nothing. I would do anything in the world for you or Mr. Lyle, as you must know, but in this way I should only do you harm." "I doubt neither your will nor ability to serve us, Mr. Walton, but see the difficulty as you do," said Florence, marking her companion's alarm at the possibility of not convincing her of the worse than inutility of such an appointment. "We must think of some other to encounter Mr. Sawyer. There is Mr. Hulton,--quick, clever, o...
