Old Man on the Brink Norberto Franco Cisneros

In today's climate of high greed and moral low ground, compassion and benevolence lag behind such lofty goals as profits for private enterprise. The elderly especially feel the greatest economic burden.

At one time, the extended family was an integral part of American life. Grandmothers and grandfathers often lived out their elderly years with their daughters or sons and their families. That has gone the way of the horse and buggy. "Old Man on the Brink" is the story of one man's struggles to make ends meet in what is supposedly the best and richest country ever devised in history, though extracted from the pain of countless native inhabitants. Still America stands tall among all democratic countries in many areas, although lately, its heart has been cut out and thrown to the bottom line wolves. At some point, the bottom liners have to ask themselves, how much is too much? "As much as my bank account can hold," is not an acceptable answer. Planetary and human lives are finite, meaning not forever, so the money-grubbers attitude portends disaster for the human race, including them.

"Old Man on the Brink" is just one story of an elderly man striving, trying to survive in an unforgiving society, including one in which his own family denies him. But there is a ray of hope, a friend that may help. However, that friend deserts him too, leaving the old man in the throes of one of the coldest nights on record, and without even the benefit of heat. Who will come to his aid when all shelters for the destitute are closed, and there are no friends to be found? A surprise ending is in store.

The plight of the many homeless people in America is horrendous. Whose responsibility are they, when government agencies renege on their responsibilities and Christians have forgotten Christ's commandment, "Love thy neighbor as thyself."
